Alternatives to Using There Are at the Start of Sentences

Although it is technically not wrong to do so, try to avoid starting a sentence with there followed by any verb of being. For example, try not to start a sentence with any of the following phrases: there is, there are, there will be, there have been, and several others.

It is not really wrong to start a sentence with one of these phrases, but it is very unnecessary, and it is not the best, most effective phrasing that can be used.

The best method of phrasing the sentence would be to reword the sentence in order to eliminate and to avoid the there phrase completely.

Here are some examples:

Unnecessary: There are three characters in this story who are very important.

Better: Three characters in this story are very important.

The word there in the first sentence is referred to as a “dummy subject.” That means that it is not the true subject of the sentence. Find the word or words in the sentence that are the true subject and then begin the sentence with those words.

Here are some more examples:

Unnecessary: There comes at the end of this story a very surprising ending.

Better: A very surprising ending comes at the end of this story.

Unnecessary: There is something about this poem that almost defies analysis.

Better: Something about this poem almost defies analysis.

Can you change the following sentences by correctly eliminating the there phrase?

1. There are some short stories that have truly become classics.

2. There is one symbol in this poem that is the most important one to analyze.

3. There have been many attempts by readers to find too much symbolism in Poe’s “The Raven.”

The Proper Use of There is . . . There are

When you are trying to decide if the verb is or are goes after the word There, just remember the following information.

First of all, the correct verb could be either is or are. It all depends on what’s in the rest of the sentence. Here is a simple, step-by-step procedure to follow that will help you determine the proper verb to use:

1. First, totally ignore the word There. Pretend it’s not even in the sentence at all.
2. Next, let your eye travel down the sentence to the right until you come to the first noun and then stop.
3. Determine if that first noun is singular or plural.
4. If that first noun is singular, then go back and put is (or any other singular form verb) into the blank space after There.
5. On the other hand, if that first noun is plural, then go back and put are (or any other plural form verb) into the blank space after There.

The above steps also apply to a sentence beginning with the word Here.

1. There _________ a large, brown envelope lying in the middle of the table.
   (is, are) (singular)
2. There _________ two tall pine trees on either side of the rusty metal gate.
   (is, are) (plural)
3. Last night, there _________ a bright full moon in the sky.
   (was, were) (singular)
4. Last year, there _________ two events that made headlines around the world.
   (was, were) (plural)
5. Here _________ an interesting example of how hard work pays off.
   (is, are) (singular)
6. Here _________ five good reasons why students should attend John A. Logan College.
   (is, are) (plural)
